Image-based 3D modeling and.Q: Are there any penalties associated with "clogging up" a blood stream with deliberate bloodletting? The question "Is deliberate bloodletting good for a patient?" is related, but dealing with polycythemia, which is not an absolute contraindication to bloodletting. This question is on the surface about a single patient and therefore is much more specific. A: I don't know if this is against any protocols, but I would think that a healthy person with no underlying medical conditions would be fine to bleed on the occasions I would bleed. Bloodletting is used for patients with pre-existing medical conditions to clear blood that is being stagnated because they can't get more. From the linked source from which I found the answer to my question, the blood is to be released until a person reaches the point where pain is no longer relieved. Empirical studies have confirmed that the neck can be used as the first choice site for bloodletting to relieve symptoms, but the use of the scrotum or rectum should be considered in situations where the neck is inaccessible or if treatment of a specific pathology is required. Also, from the same source, the author recommends a threshold of ~50 mL of blood should be released: If the patient's neck veins are easily palpable the patient
